

Dear Douglas Kirk.

I've got a private little story I wish to share with you- First, I was at a cemetery one day when I felt a 'disconnect'. I knew there were bodies buried here, but it didn't feel like there were people below me. In fact the feeling made the bodies feel non-existent- And the photos I saw there, especially of young people, simply felt like a peice of history captured- Well I read 'Everything to Me' along with the other 3 books, and it was an exciting moment on page 254- "...There were no people below- Bodies, yes, but the souls, no". It felt like my experience in a nutshell. I finished the book, then sat thinking for a minute- First, I thought of a guy from high-school whom I had always been curious about, but never spoke to. He was gone in my last year of school, but I found myself looking for him a tiny bit- Looking back, it makes me wonder; Could we have met before in another life? Or were we simply 2 strangers passing by? The thought intrigues me- And then I thought of my nana- Since I was young, I thought I might meet her and her husband Ernie again, in a place of blue skies and white clouds- And I might meet my grampa's brother Donald too- They are just 2 of the many interesting people I can think of-

Your books were very comforting- It felt like I got to know you better by reading them- And they feel like an answer to 'What happens after death', a matter I've struggled with a long time- So thanks for creating these books. I can just imagine the people who are benefiting from reading them-
